GOULD DEFEATS SOUTH PARIS 17-8

Gould had little trouble in annexing their second straight game and its first league encounter by dropping a rather shaky South Paris team 17-8.

Jenks, on the mound for Gould, for six innings, pitched a superb brand of ball, allowing only two hits and one run which was unearned. He retired when the score was 13-1 for his team. During his stay he whiffed 11 batters and yielded three bases on balls.

Crockett took over for the last three innings and was touched for four runs in his first inning, but settled down and showed, that with a little more experience he will be capable of toeing the mound whenever the occasion demands.

The entire Gould team played well all night until the game was safely won.

The South Paris pitcher, Shaw, was very inexperienced and failed to hold runners anywhere near their bases. Once on first, a man could steal all the way round to third with little effort. However, he was given terrible support in the field and especially by his catcher, who time and again allowed the ball to go past him. In the fifth inning their regular pitcher, Pihlman, came in but after retiring one man, was pounded for six straight hits before Shaw returned to the box.

Robertson at second made some nice stops on hard hit balls and Berry, a Freshman playing third, also filled his position well. Crockett, Cough and Coolidge were the leading hitters for Gould while French with a double and homer led his mates at bat.

GOVERNMENT BUYS LOCAL MACHINE SHOP

An announcement which will cause regret to many in town is the recent sale of the Herrick Brothers machine shop to the government and the removal of the equipment to Bath where it will be used in an N. Y. A. school. E. A. Herrick, who has been the more active partner in the business recently, has made no definite plans for the future although he has had several attractive offers.

This business originally started at West Bethel in 1900, making it one of the oldest businesses in town to operate without change of name. The Herrick Brothers, inventors of automatic "cool" machines, for many years manufactured and shipped machinery to many places in the United States and foreign countries, and in recent years a large part of their work has been in the construction and repair of machinery of woodworking and lumber mills.

For several years they operated in the building on High Street, built for their use by Calvin Biche, now occupied as a welder and repair shop by Warren Blake. In 1907 they built the building now in use by Lord's Garage, where they also conducted a successful automobile sales and garage business for several years. With the growth of the motor car trade the firm of Herrick Brothers Company was formed to care for the auto end of the business and an addition built to house the machine shop, which has continued until this spring.

Clarence Hall has been attending the annual session of the Grand Lodge, F. and A. M., at Portland.

MEMORIAL POPPIES TO BE SOLD SATURDAY, MAY 24

Memory of America's war dead in the first World War will be honored here on Saturday, May 24, when everyone will be asked to wear a memorial poppy in tribute to their service and sacrifice.

Plans for the observance of Poppy Day are being completed by the George A. Mundt Unit of the American Legion Auxiliary under the leadership of Mrs. Iola Forbes, Poppy Day chairman. The memorial flowers, made by disabled war veterans, will be offered on the streets throughout the day by the Auxiliary women.

"This year, with the threatening shadow of a new World War falling across America, the memorial poppy has new significance," said Mrs. Iola Forbes. "It shows that America still remembers and honors those who fell in its defense twenty-three years ago; that Americans still believe that America's free way of life is worth any sacrifice, and that the spirit of patriotism still burns strongly in American hearts."

"The poppies grew on the battle front in France where the young men of America defeated the military might of autocracy in a valiant display of aroused democracy. When we wear them on Poppy Day, their bright red blooms will remind us that our democracy has the strength to repel any dangers if we will serve as they served. There is inspiration for us all in the poppy of great memories."

"The poppies which the Auxiliary will distribute have been made by disabled veterans at Togus. All Poppy Day workers will serve as volunteers and all of the money contributed to them for the flowers will go into the welfare funds of the Auxiliary to carry forward the Auxiliary's work for the disabled, their families and the families of the dead during the year ahead."

MAINTENANCE BROADCASTS NOW AT 8:45 SUNDAY EVENING

The Mainente Music Studio broadcasts which have been in progress weekly for the past two months from station WCOU, Lewiston, are successful. The students appreciate the opportunity and are thrilled by the experience. The time has been changed to 8:45 Sunday evenings.

Next Sunday there will be a Mother's Day program. Miss Simone Payeur will sing accompanied by Miss Esther Gagnon, both pupils of Mr. Mainente, who will play the flute obligatos.

The program will include "A Song to You, Dear Mother," composed for the occasion by Mr. Mainente. In addition, the program contains "Songs My Mother Taught Me" by Dvorak and arias from the operas "Mignon" and "Carmen" by Thomas and Bizet, respectively. The flute obligatos for the four compositions are composed by Mr. Mainente.

C. OF C. TO SPONSOR INFORMATION BOOTH

At the meeting of the Bethel Chamber of Commerce Tuesday evening it was decided to operate a tourist information booth on Railroad Street this summer in cooperation with the Oxford Hills and Lakes Association and the State of Maine Publicity Bureau. John Butts was chosen to have charge of the booth. The work of the county organization was explained by its secretary, Robert Goodwin of Norway.

The principal speaker of the evening was Lewis H. Bradley of Rumford, whose topic was Military Roads. He gave a very instructive talk on military roads in general and some of the State's defense problems, and spoke in detail of the proposed military road from Portland and Canada via Rumford and the much-discussed development of a military airport on Oxford plains. This was followed by a long period of questions and discussion.

PHYSICIAN S. S. REGISTRANTS URGED TO JOIN MEDICAL RESERVE

All licensed physicians and surgeons who are Selective Service registrants are urged by Gen. James W. Hanson, State Director of Selective Service to apply for commissions in the Medical Reserve Corps. "There is a shortage of physicians and surgeons in the Medical Corps," Director Hanson said, "and such registrants can serve their country better as medical officers than as inductees for military training."

Director Hanson has instructed all local boards to communicate with physicians and surgeons among their registrants and to encourage them to seek admission into the Reserve Corps instead of selecting them for induction for military training. He pointed out that the War Department recently announced several thousand vacancies in the Medical Corps Reserve and that physicians and surgeons commissioned would be given the grade of first lieutenant.

FREE VACCINATION

According to Chapter 1, Section 163 of the Public Laws of 1933 all towns are required to offer free vaccination to all the inhabitants.

This is available, this year to the inhabitants of Bethel, who have had the mumps, at the office of Dr. H. M. Wilson, Health Officer, on Wednesday, May 14, from 9 a. m. to 12 m.

The SNAPSHOT GUILD

THOSE SMALL SUBJECTS

The boy's hand leads your eye to the chipmunk, and makes the tiny animal more prominent. The porch floor offers a plain, simple background which also helps.

AT TIMES, everyone wants to take a picture of an unusually small subject. It may be a tiny pet—such as the kitten, or the squirrel that comes up on the porch for a nut or two. In the spring, it is the robin, later in summer, it's the flower. Every one of us has said, at some time or another, "Oh! how I wish I could get closer, so this subject would show up better."

Well, you can. One method is to use a regular portrait attachment. Even with a fairly large fixed-focus camera, this will enable you to approach as near as three feet to your subject. If it is a smaller pet, a "three-point" focusing, you can get even closer—to two and one-half feet, in some cases. And with many of the finer focus cameras, the portrait attachment brings you as near as two feet. These attachments are inexpensive, and no trouble at all.

If you want to go a step further, you can use a so-called "diapler" lens. Also inexpensive. These are simple slip-on lenses, similar to the portrait attachment, but a bit more powerful. A supplementary lens marked "three-plus" will enable you to shoot with the camera only thirteen inches from your subject—which is very close indeed.

In all these shots with slip-on lenses, you should measure the distance carefully from camera to subject, and then place the camera on a solid support at exactly that correct distance. A guide or table comes with each of these lenses, and shows which range is correct for every setting of the camera.

In many cases, you can show up a small subject effectively by having something in the picture that leads up to it. For example, a hand feeding your small pet, or a person sniffing at your prize flower. This directs your attention to the small object, and makes it seem more prominent—even though it actually isn't any larger.

Try these methods, next time you tackle a small object. They're a real help, and enable you to get a much more satisfying picture.

THE TRUTH SIMPLY TOLD

Today's popularity of Doan's Pills, after many years of world-wide use, surely must be accepted as evidence of satisfactory use. And favorable public opinion supports that of the able physicians who test the value of Doan's under exacting laboratory conditions. These physicians, too, approve every word of advertising you read, the objective of which is only to recommend Doan's Pills as a good diuretic treatment for disorder of the kidney function and for relief of the pain and worry it causes. If more people were aware of how the kidneys must constantly remove waste that cannot stay in the blood without injury to health, there would be better understanding of why the whole body suffers when kidneys lag, and diuretic medication would be more often employed. Burning, scanty or too frequent urination sometimes warn of disturbed kidney function. You may suffer nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up night, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—feel weak, nervous, all played out. Use Doan's Pills. It is better to rely on a medicine that has won world-wide acclaim than on something less favorably known. Ask your neighbor!

Hot Water Supply.

QUESTION: Would it be advisable to install a coil to heat water in the firebox of my oil burning furnace? The burner is of the rotary type. Is such a coil difficult to install, and does it in any way affect the heating of the home? There are 11 in our family, and we require an abundant supply of hot water.

Answer: I do not advise putting a water heating coil in the firebox of a furnace, and especially in one with an oil burner. If your heater is hot air, you had better put in a separate pot stove, or laundry stove in which the temperature of the water can be controlled. You can get pot stoves that feed coal by a magazine or by a stoker, which are very satisfactory. It is quite possible that the modern type of storage water heater burning gas will serve your purpose. These are economical, and if you have not done so, I recommend asking your gas company for figures.

Damp Plaster.

Question: In damp weather the wall plaster in my old house sweats so that the paper becomes badly stained. Re-sizing and papering the walls does no good. Can we protect the paper by putting thin waterproofing on the plaster?

Answer: Your house suffers from a trouble that is common to old houses; the placing of the inside plaster against the brick walls. With no air space between, as would be formed by putting the plaster on lath on furring strips, the plaster is chilled by contact with the outside walls, and sweating is the result. The trouble will continue as long as the plaster is colder than the house air. One remedy is to line the walls with stiff insulating board, or to re-lay the plaster over lath on furring strips.

Easing Out Skunks.

Question: We have a family of skunks living peacefully under the porch of our house. So far, everything is O. K.; but one never knows. I have been told that they can be eased out quietly by means of a liberal sprinkling all over the ground with moth flakes. Before using I wish to make sure whether or not the flakes are non-inflammable.

Answer: The flakes are safe to use. If they were inflammable they would be risky to use in tightly closed containers for the storage of clothing. I have been told by those who know, that skunks have a strong objection to bright lights, and will break up housekeeping if an electric light bulb is hung where it will invade their privacy.

Asphalt Paint.

Question: Can asphalt roofing be painted with other than asphalt paint? Can I use a lead paint, if the roofing is first covered with shellac?

Answer: Because the asphalt expands and contracts more readily than an oil paint, the oil paint is not advisable. The paint would eventually show cracks because of this difference in expansion. Shellac would not help. Use a paint with an asphalt base.

Two-Car Garage.

Question: I would be very interested in any information you can give me about building a two-car 20 by 20 foot wood garage in the country.

Answer: You can get a pamphlet on garages from the Southern Pine Association at New Orleans, La. This booklet will give you some worthwhile information on the construction of garages.

Bathroom Walls.

Question: We are installing a basement bathroom. What inexpensive, but practical materials can we use for enclosing it?

Answer: You can use plasterboard on a framework of two by fours. The inside surface must be protected against dampness, which you can do by covering it with heavy table oil cloth, or wall-cloth finished with oil paint, hung with casein glue.

TIPS to Gardeners

GARDENS OF QUALITY

THERE have been changes in recent years in garden practices that are worth reporting. Gardeners formerly allowed vegetables to grow as large as possible. This procedure gave a higher yield in pounds, but very often it lowered the quality of vegetables.

Some vegetables, of course, like tomato, must be mature to be palatable; but carrots, cucumbers, beets, summer squash, turnips, radishes, and others are more tender and tasty when not much more than half grown.

Gardeners are finding that it is wise to plant oftener than once or twice a year, to maintain a regular supply of proper-sized vegetables. Gardens prove more enjoyable, and more profitable when successive plantings of favorite crops are made every two or three weeks, providing garden-fresh vegetables for the table over a long season.

It is also true that few gardeners today save flower seeds. Fine flowers growing in the home garden often are cross-pollinated by others of the same species, making flowers grown from their seed inferior, and untrue.

Household Hints

To keep the inside of a gas range in good condition, remove rust that may have accumulated with coarse sandpaper, then rub over entire surface with olive oil.

Many kitchens have a bare, unused wall space that could be usefully and attractively transformed into recessed shelves.

Two tablespoons chile sauce or catsup poured over top meat loaf when half-baked gives a good flavor and rather crusty covering.

Shrinkage in woollens is usually due to over-washing. In ordinary circumstances, three minutes is long enough for them.

Before baking potatoes, let them stand in hot water for 15 minutes. Then rub with butter or lard and put in oven. They will bake in half the time and will not shrink.

A Serial Every American Should Read

INSTALLMENT IX

As Boll's eye went back into the air, his mind was lifted suddenly out of the depths of black despair by a joyous miracle of development. Those new planes were closing in and he made out by the shape of wings and fuselage that they were not Van Hassek planes.

Boll's hand flashed out his field-glasses. He glued them to the skies. From under the wings of those rushing squadrons flashed the glorious legend "U. S. Army."

American planes plummeted down. Van Hassek's hangers now were droning about in a Lufberry circle awaiting the developments of attack. In a twinkling the American bird-men projected an audacious assault. Planes circled, dove, rolled, darted in the throes of combat. A plane came whistling down. Boll's jaw tightened as he saw the first casualty was an American plane. But quickly two of Van Hassek's bird-men came tumbling out of the sky.

If the Van Hassek pilots had stalled for reinforcements, they now decided upon precipitate flight against superior number. Another Van Hassek plane went down. In a minute the cloud of darting falcons passed into the distance behind.

A noon sun was burning the baked hills and swales when Boll's survivors rolled in on a Second Division outpost south of Kirk. Boll's cheek, caked in blood, was throbbing with pain, his right arm hung stiff and useless at his side. He climbed from the truck and stolidly checked his command as it came through the outpost. Forty-two men in the throes of wounds, twenty-nine had been left dead along the crimson road from Laredo.

The outpost commander came hurrying up.

"Garry to report in with my command shot to pieces like this, Colonel," Boll reported in grim dejection. "But the only chance was—capture. Where's the hospital, sir? My wounded must have care at once!"

"Eleventh's men are being evacuated to San Antonio, Captain," the outpost commander advised. "Colonel Brennan was killed, total casualties over three hundred men. But maybe that's not too bad when you consider our border cavalry was all glibbed up. The Twelfth and Fifth are still fighting it out, but they haven't any more chance than Custer had. From all reconnaissance reports, we'll be attacked in force here before many hours pass. All right, it'll get rolling."

CHAPTER IX

In Washington, Captain Benning spent a sleepless nightmare of a night on the assignment from Flagwill of observing panic-stricken streets.

Daybreak and exhaustion restored a degree of reason. People moved about now as if stunned but from time to time looking fearfully into the skies or straining at every word of radio loudspeakers that had been put in service on principal streets.

Traffic jams finally had been reduced, steady streams of cars and cabs were pouring out of the city on all roads. Thousands flicked about the railway station clamoring for standing space on any train that led away from Washington.

Extra editions of newspapers burst into the streets at frequent intervals.

Texas invaded. Extras massed black headlines over meager dispatches from San Antonio. Van Hassek was moving north in three columns. American infantry and cavalry were fighting him at the Rio

THE STORY SO FAR: Intelligence Officer Benning's warning that 200,000 foreign troops were poised in Mexico for an attack on the United States caused grave concern in army headquarters, but the people branded the statement as "war mongering." Four large southern cities were suddenly attacked from Grande. American Second Division was moving south to repel the invasion.

Another extra dashed out. Washington safe Benning read eagerly. It had been as Flagwill guessed. The night raiders had planted a refueling field. Back of the Tennessee River, southwest from Nashville. The thing had been camouflaged as a new airways enterprise, had even been fostered by ambitious and unsuspecting chambers of commerce.

When the bombers and their convoys of fighting craft had put down to fill their tanks after bombing Washington, a few mounted machine guns had kept curious natives away. The aircraft had taken all personnel off at resuming their flight back to Mexico. Another raid on Washington would be impossible—unless attack could be launched from the sea.

Benning moved down Pennsylvania Avenue. A platoon of marines walked off the White House. From a distance he could see the yawning crater that had engulfed the roof of the main building and given to war its grimmest casualty. There was a huge crater in the street, another just off Seventeenth Street back of the White House. Palpably that building had been the target of Van Hassek's sky jackals, the President's death their objective.

That subdued hum of relentless activity filled the Munitions Building. Faces were lined and gray from strain and fatigue, but eyes burned from smudged sockets with stern resolution.

Colonel Flagwill was not in his office. He had been called for another conference with General Hague Benning, as he waited, checked through the intelligence summaries, compiled by assistants, from hundreds of telegrams and messages on the state of the realm.

The night's panic had swept the whole country. In the maddest there had been incredulity at first. The whole thing seemed too inconceivable. Invasions, bomber raids, were an intangible atrocity occurring to distant peoples and recorded in dispatches. These inexplicable atrocities belonged to the black pages of Shanghai, Canton, and Madrid.

Already the hue and cry was rising west of the Alleghenies sharp on the heels of the first hysterical waves of fear. What of the Army? Why had our armed forces been caught napping? Why hadn't the raiders been detected and shut down? What was the matter with the United States Army that such a thing could happen? Was our air service asleep at the switch, along with the generals in Washington?

In New York there had been a major panic that for a time surged out of control of the police. Scores of people had been killed and injured by traffic out of control as people fled the city. Tens of thousands had taken refuge in subways. Tunnels under the Harlem had been jammed by people. The 15th Infantry had been rushed in from Fort Jay to help the police restore order. Roads and trains leading west and north were jammed by fleeing people deep to incessant broadcasts of reassurance that New York was safe from air raids for the time being.

The first reports of mobilization of Army and National Guard were the air; Washington was bombed and the President killed. General Brill, commander of the army in Texas, reported to General Hague at Washington that he was opposed by greatly superior forces. General Hague told him to resist the enemy's advance at all costs. Brill ordered Captain Boll to lead the 11th U. S.

pouring in. Mobilization was less than one fourth complete. The Regular Army was ready to entrain for concentration points from its far-flung network of small garrisons whose location had been dictated by chambers of commerce and congressmen rather than by the necessities of military training in the vital team-play of larger units.

Plans were being laid for a call for 500,000 volunteers. That would have to wait action by Congress, but Congress could be depended upon now to go the limit. A draft army of a million men would come next.

As for modern equipment, that would have to wait. There would be no such thing as buying it in France and England, even in Canada, as at the time of the World

"I have two reports that will interest you."

War. A year, or two years, might elapse before industrial mobilization, the country's own resources, could provide anything more than the crudest necessities of combat. If a major war was in the offing, the country would have to depend upon the massed valor of its manpower to take unequal red losses and drive through at all costs.

It was nine o'clock before Colonel Flagwill stamped in from the Chief of Staff's office. His face was ashen and hard, but his level black eyes glowed vitality. Flagwill dropped into his chair, lighted a cigarette, and lapsed back for brief relaxation from the tension of the past few hours.

"What an infernal tangle!" he muttered to Benning with a tormented shake of his head. "Which way to turn, that's the question bedeviling all of us."

"I've been reading the reports and recommendations of the staff sections, sir," Benning answered. "Mobilization seems to be moving right along and the panic is cooling off, even in Washington."

"Mobilizing is one thing, fighting another," Flagwill snapped out. "By tonight, when the Second gets cracked at San Antonio, the whole country will be howling for action. The howl for anti aircraft is already infantry into position for battle. Boll's motor column bravely withstood a terrible strafing from enemy aircraft, but he ordered the men to abandon their trucks when he observed twenty more planes approaching. Further resistance seemed useless to him.

Now continue with the story.

pouring in—and every one of our ten regiments of anti-aircraft is short something, a battery or two, a full battalion, or essential equipment. Not to mention ammunition. Massing all of it together wouldn't protect San Antonio and New Orleans, not to mention Washington, New York, and way points. The only bright spot is our air service. We're shoving in as much of it as we dare, but our planes will take an awful drubbing from Van Hassek's anti-aircraft."

An orderly came in with a jug of hot coffee and some sandwiches. Benning drained a cup of coffee.

"The big trouble is, we don't know yet what we're up against and we've got to play a cautious game. If all we had to consider was Van Hassek, we'd rush troops in there and give him his lesson in a very few weeks. What the public will not be able to understand, nor even Congress, is that we've got to use most of our peace-strength army as a framework for building a national army. What a pity we haven't got our army concentrated in divisions and highly motorized so we could shove it here and there as needed."

"But anyhow, come what may with the future," Flagwill went on with a sardonic grin, "the Chief has just made one ten-strike of a decision. We're to make our first real military stand down around Fort Worth, which is about as far as Van Hassek would dare go in any event."

Flagwill bolted a sandwich and washed it down with a cup of coffee, then pulled himself up to his desk.

"I've two reports that will interest you, Benning," he announced abruptly. "First, we've a tip from London that the Coalition espionage system in the United States is organized to completely wreck our industrial organization. That merely confirms what we'd guessed long ago. They also suggest that the enemy espionage has its headquarters in New York, disguised as some large corporation, no details available. Second, I have positive information that Van Hassek's bombers had ground bases in Washington last night. Light signals were flashed from the area of the White House during both raids."

Benning started. Into his mind flashed Captain Fincke's cryptic statements at the Shorcham. Promptly he decided against reporting this conversation for the time being. He gave Flagwill a brief account of his discovery of the Austrian captain and Colonel Buggio and explained his logic in not immediately causing their arrest.

"All right, Benning," Flagwill said, his eyes snapping. "I'll assume you made no mistake in not arresting them last night. But now you forget everything else and get out after them! Use your own judgment about when you make arrests, but see to it they don't get away from you. I needn't tell you that the Coalition spy net is ten times more dangerous in the long run than Van Hassek's present rotten invasion."

CHAPTER X

General Mole sat in the hot shelter of his command post which had been dug by engineers into the reverse slope of a squat ridge. He puffed glumly at the stub of a cigar as he observed the arrival of his regimental and battalion commanders whom he had summoned from over his battle position.

Planes soared overhead, American combat planes covering his position against air attack. From time to time an observation plane dashed low with a dropped message reporting progress of the Van Hassek approach. At last word, the main Van Hassek column had cleared the Nueces River after routing a motorized battalion strong-point that Mole had sent out to gain contact and delay the enemy.

Mole's plan of battle was shaped; his formal orders had been distributed. Since morning the men had been digging in.

All his artillery had been dug in and camouflaged. Here he had an immense, hastily organized citadel of mutually supporting strong-points. Machine guns had been placed for the maximum of destructive effect. The breaking of one line yielded the enemy the grim necessity of attacking a new one. Roads menacing his flanks were strongly covered. It was not such a position as he would have selected of his own choice, but since necessity forced it on him, he meant to make the most of his opportunities for stubborn resistance.

His senior aide-de-camp came up to him and saluted.

"Sir, the officers are assembled," the captain advised.

There was a greenish hue to the general's lean, cadaverous face, brought by the stress of the past few days. His eyes were bloodshot under puffy black lids, but they shone with a stout, even glitter, that proclaimed the mastery of will over flesh. As he stood up to face his assembled commanders, he was perfectly contained.

"I wanted a few words with you before we go into action, gentlemen," he began in a calm voice. "The decision to fight here was made for us by General Hague. Therefore, it becomes our decision. Let me frankly say that the Army is on the spot, that the people wouldn't understand the simple wisdom of our falling back without a fight."

He paused and his pale, bluish lips drew down into an expression of bitterness.

"All right, we'll go through! We'll hold! We'll give the country a new tradition to remember! We'll fight Van Hassek with one regiment to four or five! If we're attacked this afternoon we'll fight until night. We'll hold through tomorrow. Then I'll make my further decision. When the time comes I'll give the order for withdrawal which must be by night."

General Mole paused again to look about among them and then spoke in slow, biting words.

"Gentlemen, a final word! We'll show the country what our mettle is. We'll show the enemy what they can expect to meet once our armies are mobilized and organized and trained. Remember this, if we lost every last man in the Second Division, our losses would still be only a fraction of what the good old Second took in France, even if nobody remembers that fact but the Second's survivors!"

His voice rose to a furious intensity and his clenched hand rose above his head.

"A new Alamo to remember, gentlemen! That's what we'll give the country—a new Alamo to remember! Put that thought into the teeth of your men. That's all!"

THURSDAY, MAY 8, 1941

We have had a lot of talk about whether or not strikes were causing much havoc in the defense program, but until recently we haven't had very much in the way of calm and authoritative figures. Now the National Association of Manufacturers has issued some statistics on defense and other strikes that would sweep a number of unsupported declarations into the discard.

The N. A. M. study shows that total number of man-days lost from strikes in the first three months of this year were more than three times as great as for the same period in 1940. In all, 3,022,918 man-days were lost in January, February and March of this year; and of this total, 1,578,000 man-days were directly in defense industries.

The time lost in those industries would have been enough to equip about 1,402,480 American soldiers with the latest Garand rifles, or to provide more than five billion rounds of ammunition for those rifles. Seen in those terms or in any others the harm done can hardly be minimized.

The great danger lies in the attitude of some who continue to claim, in the face of the evidence, that the number or result of strikes in defense is really not very important. The figures knock that complacency galley-west.

Defense is either vital or it isn't.
The American people think that it is, and will be paying billions in taxes to support their belief. In the light of that stand, there is an all-important need to work out solutions for any problems that arise without recourse to strikes that cripple our all-out effort for national defense.

National and International Problems Inseparable from Local Welfare

As various authorities, including the President, have lately observed, an American characteristic has been to be buoyed up into the clouds of optimism by British victories, and to be cast down into the depths of despair by British defeats. This, these authorities believe, is a mistake. In a great war, the tide of victory never runs one way. The achievements must be accompanied by the failures. And so, it is argued, the British-Greek-Yugo-Slavian debacle in the Balkans, bad as it is, should not be exaggerated. The decisive battle of this war is the battle of England and the Atlantic—Hitler may go far elsewhere, but until England herself falls, he cannot win.

Looking back now on the Balkan campaign, it seems apparent that the British either underestimated the German power, or overestimated the effectiveness of their allies. It was felt in military circles that Yugoslavia, with the aid of her difficult terrain, should be able to last many weeks—she actually fell in 13 days, and long before the end her armies were in swift retreat, and were cut off from each other. It was felt that the mountainous country of Greece, among the severest in the world, would slow the German mechanized advance. Yet the German small tanks went over precipitous mountain passes almost as easily as if they were traveling on roads, and the Greek army found that personal valor could not compensate for the immense superiority the Germans possessed in equipment. The same thing was true of the Anzac troops of General Wavell's army, which were transported to Greece from Africa. Man for man, the reporters on the scene wrote, they were far better than their German foes. But the greatest of courage is a frail weapon indeed against a tank.

On top of that, it is apparently true that, again, the Germans demonstrated a far greater efficiency staff work. There was no unified Allied command in the Balkans, and the respective General Staffs had little opportunity for consultation and cooperative planning. As usual, the German campaign was blueprinted to the last detail, and it went off according to schedule.

There are critics in England as well as here, who believe and say that the British should never have transferred troops to Greece—that defeat was foredoomed. This criticism was answered by Mr. Churchill in his world-wide talk of April 27. He said that one of the greatest strengths of Britain lies in the admiration and respect she has gained in the United States and elsewhere, and that if she had let her allies down, after encouraging them to fight and pledging aid, much of that regard would have been lost. There was, in other words, a great question of national honor involved, in the British government's view. And so the desperate gamble was taken.

What achievements we may next expect of Hitler remain to be seen. In his talk, Mr. Churchill was not sanguine about the immediate future—he intimated that the Axis may dominate the Black and Caspian seas, may overrun Turkey, and seize or otherwise obtain the great wheat and oil lands of the Soviet Union. He pointed out that General Wavell's African forces, which chased the Italians out of Libya, and have since suffered reverses from strong German detachments, were smaller than most realized—30,000 men with relatively little mechanized equipment. However, Britain does have great forces in Egypt, and the Germans should find the going harder there.

In the meantime, it was a great day for Britain when President Roosevelt decided to extend American naval and air patrols as far as Greenland, and said that lurking submarines and raiders when spotted would be reported to merchant ships. This means that Britain will have to patrol a great deal less of the Atlantic, and can concentrate her none-too-numerous naval forces in the areas where they are most vitality needed. The loss of shipping, after all, is far more dangerous to Britain's ultimate hopes than is the loss of local campaigns in Europe or Africa. For, if Hitler can isolate Britain from the New World, and shut off the war materials and the food she must have to survive and fight, he will win the war. It is in the Atlantic, almost all authorities think, that the end of this grim story must finally and irrevocably be told.

The new tax bill, as proposed by the Treasury, was a great deal stiffer than early reports indicated, and most columns, including this one, erred on the side of understatement when forecasting what it was to involve.

In the lower and middle income brackets, the Treasury proposal would up income taxes in the neighborhood of 600%. The bill also involves a large number of excise taxes on various commodities.

The tax bill would do more than raise money. It would hold down consumer purchasing power, which would be a bar against inflation, and which would indirectly prevent materials needed for war purposes being used for consumers' goods purposes.

SAVIN ANNIVERSARY

This was followed by an original poem, written and read by Mrs. Florence Hamlin:

If you'll give just a minute,
There's a word I'd like to say.
It's about the grandest couple
You'll meet in many a day.

Through the years we've neighbor-
ed with them
They've been steadfast, kind and true.

But let's turn the pages back a bit
Here, I'll turn them back for you.

How far back will I be turning?
Five and forty years I'd say.
To the beauty of a springtime
In the glorious month of May.

Mid old Albany's hills and valleys
Cora lived, so young and fair, God's own grace was in her make-up.

God's own sunshine in her hair,
Out from Waterford came Harry, Straight from Savin Hill he came.

Asked fair Cora did she love him,
Asked her would she change her name.

We have easily guessed her answer
And with buggy shining bright, Old horse "Fan" all combed and curried.

They were sure a handsome sight.
Straight to Bethel Hill they came,
friends.

And ever day was on the wane
Good old "Fan" came to the parsonage
Scarce a hand upon the rein.

Here "Good Parson Barton" met
them,
Took them each one by the hand,
Gave to them of God's own blessing, Tied a knot that sure would stand.

To Vermont's fair hills they journeyed,
Stayed for six months more or less,

But the homeland seemed to call
them
As she ever calls the best.

Back to Waterford they then came,
Lived among the friends they loved.

Worked and neighbored with their kinsmen
Looking off to God above.

Then a baby came to bless them,
Just a tiny baby boy,
Came to bind them ever closer,
Came to fill their home with joy.

Months and years rolled swiftly onward
Then one bright and sunny day
These good friends came here to Bethel.

And this time they came to stay
We have seen them coming, going,
Summer, winter, spring and fall,
We have found them kindly neighbors.

Reaching helpful hands to all,
Now we've come to do them honor
On this Anniversary Day.

Asking God to bless and keep them,
Shed His light upon their way.

Let us give them a big hand friends
For a love that's stood the test,
Weathered every kind of weather,
Is deserving of our best.

The next number on the program was the presentation of a gold coin filled with money from the members of Sunset Rebekah Lodge. This was presented in the form of a wedding ceremony. At the strains of "I Love You Truly" the curtain was drawn, and a spot light thrown onto an archway which was decorated in evergreens and rosebuds.

Miss Maxine Clough was dressed as the bride and carried yellow dal-sies, and Miss Elizabeth Lyon as groom wearing a boutonniere of yellow carnations, with Marjory Dudley, wearing blue silk crepe, as train bearer. They stood in the arch way, while Miss Hazel Grover, accompanied by Mr. Kathryn Taylor at the piano and Mrs. Madeleine Dudley, violin, sang "I Love You Truly." As the wedding march was played the bride couple escorted Miss Benetree Brown to the honored guests and presented them with the bride's bouquet and the groom's boutonniere, and Miss Brown presented the gift from Sunset Rebekah Lodge with the following original poem:

As you hear the old sweet echo
Of wedding bells in chime,
And memory gently leads you back
To that dear far off time,
And as your thoughts roam through the years
Of love and friendship true
May every hour of this glad day
Be golden bright for you
For together down the road of life
You two have made your way,
Each year a stepping stone to this,
Your forty-fifth anniversary day,
And now how happy you must be,
How proud you must be too!
And so congratulations
To two splendid folks like you.
For what a wonderful occasion
And what memories it must hold
Of all the happiness you must have shared.

Along your path of gold,
Just 45 years ago today
You wrought a magic key
Unlocking all the happiness
You hold in memory.
Today that key has turned to gold
And gleams with promise new
For all the happy future years
It will, unlock for you.
For once in a while there's a perfect day

With the sun and the songs and the birds of May
And once in a while there's a dream
comes true,
For once in a while there are friends like you.

Miss Carrie Wright, in behalf of the teachers, presented the honored guest with a purse of money, with these original words:
Among the many who have come to say
"Congratulations" on this happy day
Are the village teachers, known to you
As friends who are loyal, staunch and true

A little gift I bring for them
But all I can say is just A-hem,
You know the wishes we convey
For your health and happiness day by day.

So I'll say no more but leave with
you
This token of our friendship true.
The Noble Grand of North Waterford Lodge presented a beautiful bedspread

The honored guests and friends were escorted to the dining hall where refreshments of ice cream and cake were served.

THIS BUSINESS

Living
BY SUSAN THAYER

THE ONE THING THAT MATTERS

The factories of America are working full time again—double time, in many cases, as thousands of men and women go to new jobs each week. There is no need now to "make work" for people. Instead, the problem is to find people for jobs that must be done if defense production is to go forward according to schedule or ahead of schedule as Mr. Knudsen of the Office of Production in Washington asks.

We are all vitally concerned with this defense effort—housekeepers as well as factory managers, school children as well as bankers, ministers as well as draftees in the army. Upon the success of this effort depends not only our physical safety but those "ancient liberties" that have been ours ever since we became a nation.

Of course none of us can even imagine living in a community where we can't say what we think, no matter how many other people may see it quite differently. We just don't understand hesitating to go to the church we believe in and we can't conceive what it would be like to be governed by people we didn't put into office ourselves. But the right to live as free men and women with the privilege of self-expression is not inevitable. It was achieved through the centuries by effort and sacrifice. We see now that it can only be preserved through similar effort and sacrifice. Right now this freedom of ours is in grave danger and until it is safe nothing else matters very much.

If there were a fire in your neighborhood and sparks were flying toward your house, you wouldn't go on building an annex or putting up new curtains at that moment. You'd drop whatever improvements you were working on to do what was necessary to save your house. After that you would go back to the other job.

Today our national house is in danger and nothing should detract us, until we have enough defense equipment to make it safe. To be sure we must keep our family life as normal as possible. That's part of keeping the country safe. We must take good care of our children and give them a feeling of security. But do we need to go in for costly national improvements when we haven't yet built the guns and tanks, the ships and planes we need for safety? Should we keep on pouring money into non-emergency projects when we need billions for defense?

Women see things like this because we know from our experience with the family budget that money can't go two places at once and that a big job or expense means going without a lot of small, pleasant, but non-essential things for a time.

Rural Boys 'Make Good' As President's Advisers

Harry Hopkins and Leon Henderson Have FDR's Confidence in Policies
Vital to U. S. Welfare.

By BAUKHAGE

National Farm and Home Hour Commentator.

(WNU Service, 1343 H Street N. W., Washington, D. C.)

WASHINGTON. — America faces its second crisis under Roosevelt. Whether America knows it or not—and by the time this reaches print the last doubt may be removed—the President knows it now. The first crisis was the peak of the economic panic. The present one is the valley of allied fortunes.

The WPA and the NRA were two of the institutions which the President created to meet our economic problems in 1933. Since then many an outstanding member of the New Deal palace guard has had his hour to strut and fret upon the stage and then be heard no more. General Johnson and his blue eagle—now a mere columnist; Donald Richberg, his successor, back with his law books; the professors, Raymond Moley, once in the state department, today behind an editorial desk in the seat of the scorpion, and Rexford Guy Tugwell, still loyal, but silent, a partner of industry. We might go on.

But two men, one a veteran of NRA, another of WPA, have been chosen to sit at the right and left hands of the Chief in crisis II: Harry Hopkins, head of the program under the lend-lease law, and Leon Henderson, officer of price administration and civilian supply.

The two men are alike in few characteristics except that both were poor farm boys, both have a New Deal slant on life, and neither has much interest in the art of a Fifth avenue tailor.

There is no doubt that the defense program, if we must still use that euphemistic label for this anything but negative undertaking, has passed out of the joint power of the dollar-a-year men and into control of these two staunch supporters of the Roosevelt administration.

The rise of Harry Hopkins' influence has been steady, interrupted only by periods of ill-health. His relationship with the President started from a sympathy of viewpoint concerning the duty of government toward its underprivileged. It has grown into an intimate friendship, fastened by propinquity that comes from sharing the same roof and many leisure hours, before nine in the morning and after six at night, since May of last year.

That was when Hitler's blitz across the low countries showed the President that the possibility of peaceful intervention in the cause of democracy in Europe was over. In his despair, he called his friend to the White House for a week-end of comfort and counsel. Hopkins has been there ever since.

Perhaps the barefoot boy driving a neighbor's cows up a dusty lane some four decades ago dreamed of the White House—every boy has a chance to be President we know. But how many boys dream of being a President's chief advisor and handling seven billion dollars' worth of supplies for democracy?

Harry's father was a harness maker. He had a harness shop in Grinnell, Iowa, and it was in Iowa because Mrs. Hopkins was ambitious for her children and there was a college there. Harry earned some nickels and dimes herding cows, and then worked in the shop. Later he worked his way through college. Money never meant much to him. He never handled much of his own. But he has bossed millions for other people—in the Red Cross during the World war, with the Association for the Improvement of the Poor in New York, where he got to know Governor Roosevelt, and then with the relief organization of the federal government.

Hopkins, lean, slight, amiable, grew up with the New Deal.

So did Leon Henderson but he reached the inner circle by a more roundabout way. He is thick-set and dynamic and he blustered into the confidence of General Johnson in the NRA, as an economist who could punctuate his theories with the salty expletives that appealed to Old Iron Pants.

When the blue eagle folded its wings, Henderson plowed his own furrow and got out of the way when he was not needed but always managed to bob up when he had a chance to say something important. He predicted the "bust" as he called it—the slump of 1937. In 1938 he warned against price rises. He kept warning. Prices went up. Now he is czar over prices.

Like Hopkins, Henderson worked his way through college. Like him, too, the jobs he has held since his maturity were all outside the marts of trade and commerce.

These two self-made rural boys see the same dreams of America when they look out of the White House windows side by side with the Hyde Park Squire.

Early Morning In a Nation's Capital

Six o'clock in the morning. From a Saturday to a Monday spring changed to summer in Washington, buds turned to blooms and bare branches burst out into full-leaved green.

In a city, the first walk under this newly spread canopy of green is a strange delight. There is nothing quite like it. Leafy barmans shut out the harsh, cold stone and steel about you as a drawn shade shuts out the night from a lamp-lit room.

Washington does not wake early. At six in the morning there are so few people on the streets that the folks you pass seem as friendly as a neighbor you meet on a lonely lane. The red and green traffic lights still have their eyes closed and only the yellow bulbs blink sleepily at you as they have all night. But these days the sun is well up and as you walk west to east the light strikes you square in the eyes. It always reminds me of a prairie town and that always reminds me of how I was reminded of my prairie town when we used to be marching eastward in the dawn of a murky French morning when the sun suddenly burst on us and made us long for the old, wide-brimmed campaign hat instead of the little cloth rag of an overseas cap. You don't see many campaign hats any more.

As I came down the avenue this morning almost-empty buses passed me. I saw a colored man watering a pathetic little patch of lawn in front of his two-story cottage. The rest of the family were still asleep, the bedroom windows were open. I saw an old-fashioned ornate oil lamp in one.

All rooms seem to be bedrooms in Washington. The fine old residences are turned into rooming houses—many of them—and early in the morning the windows are open. In an hour thousands of government workers will be hurriedly dressing behind carelessly drawn shades, then jamming the now-empty buses with all the roomy comfort of steers in a cattle-car.

Between old, transmogrified residences rise the new apartments. Here and there are a few that sprang into being when 1917 filled the city with war workers.

They are frequently impressive looking on the outside, built to suggest a French chateau. Inside, tiny little boxes of rooms with low ceilings that the third floor windows can hardly see over the sills of the second floor of the residences next door.

But the modern apartments that are springing up like dandelions these days do not go in for French facades. They are the same boxes inside. Outside, there are ugly flat walls with plenty of glass, the whole entrance is glass. They look too much like modern Moscow to please my old-fashioned eyes.

The emergency has brought so many extra workers to Washington that office space is at a premium. In spite of new buildings in the District of Columbia two federal buildings are being erected in adjoining Maryland and Virginia. These buildings provide a million additional square feet of office space to meet the increased demand.

WEEKLY NEWS ANALYSIS

A Non-Partisan Editorial Review of the Events of Each Week, Illustrated

EDITOR'S NOTE—When opinions are expressed in these columns, they are those of the news analyst, and not necessarily of this newspaper.

U. S. ATTITUDE: Toward War

In this country the reaction to the loss of the Greek campaign was sharp.

The forces of the isolationists immediately took to the air, held a giant mass-meeting in New York, which was marked by violence outside the hall, and, paced by Charles A. Lindbergh, took an "I told you so" attitude, urging the nation to believe that British defeat of the Nazis was not only impossible, but that British loss of the war was a certainty, and that if America gave

CHARLES A. LINDBERGH
He "took the air."

"all-out" aid to Britain that we, too, would suffer through this defeat.

President Roosevelt, frankly infuriated by this attitude and these utterances, had Secretary Hull and Secretary Knox take to the radio and prepare the way for a statement by the President which ripped the "defeatists" up the back, and made it plain that the government would have none of this attitude.

The administration, they said, was frankly committed to "all-out" aid to Britain, and would go its way toward this goal. Instead of retrenching on this policy, as urged by the Lindbergh coterie, it was boldly announced that the government would extend its aid still more vigorously.

Slingshotting out Lindbergh especially for administration fire, the President, in a press conference, characterized him as an "appeaser" and "defeatist" and used the word "copperhead" in making a comparison with earlier days in American history.

Aftermath of the President's remarks regarding Lindbergh was the news that he announced his resignation as a colonel in the U. S. army air corps reserve. He said he was "greatly disturbed" at the implications made by the President regarding his loyalty toward the United States. He had been an officer in the reserve air corps since 1927, year of historic flight to Paris.

PATROL:
Extended

The navy, said the President, now was engaged in extending the neutrally patrol 1,000 miles out into the Atlantic, and that its protection to American shipping, especially to vessels carrying aid to Britain, would know no boundaries on the seven seas.

This brought the question of convoys out into the open, which the President had simply leaped over in his statement, taking the stand that discussion of convoys was beside the point, as he considered it the navy's job to keep the waters 1,000 miles off the American coast safe for all shipping.

At the same time he made the rather cryptic statement that he had information that the Nazis already were setting foot on Greenland and that the United States would deal with this phase of the situation, which indeed brought the war mightily close to this country.

In the meantime newspapers took another poll of the senate on the question of convoys, and found that body to be in favor of convoying supplies to Britain, though only by a vote of 50 to 45. If convoying meant active participation in the war, as many claimed, the informal canvass of the senate showed the temper of congress, at any rate.

Included in the tentative list opposed to convoying were 25 of the senate's 28 Republican members. The only official act connected with the subject of convoying was the Tobey resolution, and they were seen as supporters of this measure. Adding to this the non-intervention Democrats, and some other scattering votes, and Tobey's resolution, which would forbid convoying, could only look for 45 votes.

The Tobey move, however, was not considered so vital by some senators, these holding that President Roosevelt's executive power as navy head would permit him to put a convoy plan into effect by executive order, with no sanction by the senate or house asked or needed.

GREEKS:
'Out'

Closing days of the Greek campaign were stirring. The British made a noble stand of three to four days at Thermopylae pass, historic rendezvous with heroism of Leonidas in ancient days, only to lose the pass after heroic resistance and after inflicting admittedly heavy casualties on the invading Nazi hordes.

The second great stand was made on Mount Gerania, the British high command, after a careful advance study of the terrain, finding places to defend that the Germans had claimed were impossible.

There was hardly a question even in British and Greek circles of making a successful stand, but the valiant Australian and New Zealand soldiers fought a rear-guard action that military men said would live in history.

Main objective of the British, after the port of Piraeus was shown to be impossible as an evacuation port, was to gain the southern portions of Greece and make the final stand on Crete and other islands.

The flight of the government from Athens prepared the Greek people for the eventual occupation of the historic capital by the Nazis. Yet the Greeks, with unswerving devotion to their cause, seemed not dismayed by the loss of their capital, but seemed willing to fight on to the end, as did the British.

Churchill had prepared the British for the bad news of the Greek campaign, and toward the close Athens dispatches frankly admitted that the final stages of the fighting were simply rear-guard actions.

While there was again raised in England among the people the cry of "too little and too late," the people of Australia seemed little inclined to criticize, but on the other hand seemed proud of the achievement of their armies.

The loss of the Greek campaign was more of a shock to those in the United States who had been hoping that American aid through the lease-lend bill might turn the battle.

Yet from more considered sources came the word that the Greek defense should not be viewed in that light, but rather from the standpoint of a general harassing and delaying action against Germany.

Three persons held that it should be taken into account how severe the Nazi losses had been, (that they were heavy were frank admissions from Berlin) and how Germany only had been able to win through enormous air superiority.

The cost to the Nazis of having to transport food and men and munitions for the final weeks almost entirely by plane must have been enormous in fuel alone, which Germany was unable to spare.

The surprise expressed by King George of Greece at the sudden surrender of the army of Epirus which precipitated the close of the Nazi-Greek campaign and just preceded the flight of the government to Crete caused the commanders later to tell part of the story.

STRIKE:
Situation

President Roosevelt rolled up his sleeves and sailed into the coal strike personally, bidding fair to handle this as he had other problems.

Under his personal urging negotiations were resumed, and a settlement finally reached.

In the midst of all this particularly when the United Automobile Workers (C. I. O.) threatened to shut down 60-odd plants of General Motors, engaged in nearly half a billion of defense orders for motorized equipment, came a vigorous outburst against Secretary Perkins. The rumor was published that Miss Perkins' resignation was on President Roosevelt's desk, and one senator urged that if it were not true that Secretary Perkins should resign, and that if it were true the President should accept it.

What was needed in that post was not a woman, but a two-fisted man "with the intestinal fortitude" to deal with labor troubles. This outburst against Miss Perkins was almost immediately followed by her prompt certification of the threatened auto strike to the mediation board, thus practically washing her hands of the matter.

The company held that a work stoppage of non-defense portions of factories would naturally and inevitably result in full stoppage. Faced with this evidence, Miss Perkins dictated and signed a statement which started:

"The dispute between the General Motors corporation and the United Automobile Workers of America threatens to burden and obstruct the production or transportation of equipment and materials essential to national defense and cannot be adjusted by the commissioners of conciliation of the department of labor."

The mediation board promptly sent this message to both corporation and unions affected and set an early date for a hearing. This had the immediate result of producing a union agreement to call off the strike pending some effort by the board to make adjustments.

NAVY:

Buys an Airfield

For an undisclosed sum, believed to be about $9,000,000, the navy bought Floyd Bennett airfield in New York, intending to establish on its 387 acres the nation's biggest naval air base.

The deal, it was announced, would still permit the use of the field as an emergency landing field for commercial aviation if LaGuardia field was closed.

The field, with 62,500 square feet of hangar space, will be put into service at once, and will, navy officials pointed out, bring naval aviation closer to the most important scene of its activities, the North Atlantic.

At present the chief naval air bases in this country are Pensacola, Fla., on the East and San Diego, Calif., on the West coast. The need of an important base of greater size than Anacostia, close to Washington, D. C., brought about the deal with New York city, and brings the navy in force to the air-above Long Island sound.

MISCELLANY:

PIRAEUS: The Haras, formerly one of Harold Vanderbilt's yachts, was sunk by a German dive bomber as it was seeking to evacuate a large number of civilians trying to return from Greece's mainland to their island homes. One bomb burst in the vessel's hold and practically the entire passenger list was lost.

TOKYO: In the role of an Axis salesman back from a "trip to the factory," Foreign Minister Matsuoka of Japan informed the Japanese people through the press that the lot of the worker in Germany is a happy one, and that the people of that nation like the system that takes complete governmental control of all their activities.

NEW YORK: Fritz Kreisler, master violinist, was victim of a traffic accident near his home, as he was on his way to luncheon. He was struck by a truck and his skull fractured.

WASHINGTON: Getting ready to make use of seized German, Italian and Danish vessels, the government was reported taking steps to seek unified action by all Pan-American nations.

OTTAWA: Two of the officers in charge of the German prison camp have been relieved of their duties following the break in which 28 escaped. It was finally announced that two of the fugitives were killed and the other 26 recaptured. Some had reached the American border but did not get across.

CAIRO: British forces were pointing to two major activities as a possible turning point in the Battle of North Africa, which had been going heavily against the British forces lately. One was that a terrific artillery attack had forced the Nazi forces to fall back from in front of besieged Tobruk, and the other was the naval bombardment of Tripoli, regarded in high British military circles as a "continuing event of great importance."

HIGHLIGHTS . . . in U. S. Defense news

Administrators Henderson of the Office of Price Administration and Civilian Supply requested manufacturers of farm implements not to increase the prices of farm machinery at this time. Mr. Henderson pointed out that in announcing the steel price schedule he had stressed the wide range of finished products of which steel is a part and the importance of maintaining stable prices in these finished products.

The navy assigned to Great Britain, 20 small fast torpedo boats, under the Lease-Lend program, and Secretary Knox said U. S. and Canadian officials are discussing a mutual program for the construction in Canadian shipyards of additional small craft for Britain.

Commerce Secretary Jones, speaking in New York, said the nation's defense effort is "better than good . . . but . . . no matter how fast defense production climbs, it will not be fast enough to meet the need nor to satisfy our state of mind . . ."

Treasury Secretary Morgenthau announced an agreement setting up a fund of $50,000,000, contributed by the U. S., and $20,000,000, contributed by Chinese government banks, to stabilize Chinese currency. A joint statement by Mr. Morgenthau and Dr. T. V. Soong of the Central Bank of China, described the agreement as a "co-operative agreement between friendly nations that are working together in many ways."

The President issued a statement that the British Red Cross has appealed through the American Red Cross for up to 1,000 young American doctors to serve in British military and civilian hospitals.

OPM Deputy Production Director Batt, also speaking in New York, asked the nation's industry "to do much more than it has" in the defense effort and to do it "without looking to see whether the other fellow is doing his share. Mr. Batt said the public will have no sympathy with any half-hearted or faint defense efforts."

The war department appointed a 14-man civilian board to review amortization applications of industries receiving army defense contracts and seeking to write off against taxes the costs of added facilities. The senate approved legislation authorizing the secretary of war to waive statutory requirements for performance bonds on defense supply contracts.

Treasury Secretary Morgenthau requested congress to extend to all government departments authority to award cost-plus-fixed-fee contracts in order to (1) speed such contracts; (2) spread defense work; and (3) curtail free publicity of contracts awarded on competitive bidding.

'We, the People'

Here is a poster being issued by the Office for Production Management of the Defense Commission in Washington for use in street cars, busses and subway trains, etc. It calls attention to the government's rearmament drive and urges Mr. Public to heed that: "WE, the people," ARM FOR DEFENSE.

GOULD SUFFERS DEFEAT AT HANDS OF NORWAY 11-7

The Gould team played lifeless ball at Norway Tuesday to drop their first game, 11-7. The team lacked hustle in the field, at the plate, and especially on the bases where dumb base-running eliminated every chance the team had of overcoming their rivals. Two men soon learned that the Norway infielders had good arms when they were nipped at second trying to stretch hits. Perry was nailed at third on a bluff peg to second by the catcher and, to top it all, Cummings and Crockett both left third on fly balls with the bases loaded and only one out.

Mechanically the team looked good both in the field and at bat, securing 16 safeties and committing only two errors. However, without proper team spirit not much can be expected when the opposition is strong. The younger fellows on the team are playing good ball but expect a certain amount of leadership from the older and more experienced boys which is lacking.

Norway got away to a good lead by scoring three runs in the second on a combination of four hits, a hit batsman and two stolen bases. Gould came back with two in the third on a hit by Clough and two errors. Gould scored again in the fourth to take a 5-4 lead when Berry singled. Perry singled but was out trying to stretch it, then Amato Robertson and Crockett singled in quick succession. Amato had the Norway infield entirely stirred up in this frame with his antics on the basepaths. After Gould had blown their chances in the seventh with the bases loaded, Norway scored three times and the same thing happened again in the eighth.

The next encounter is at Fryeburg Wednesday, May 14. This game will have to be won if the team is to stay in the league race.
